This course will explore the intersection of ideas about the ‘self’ with the capitalist mode of production, the commodity form, logics of promotion, new technologies, and labour. We will examine theories of the self and subjectivity in the writings of Marx, Adam Smith, Althusser, Gramsci and Foucault and will explore theories of the outer-directed performative self from sociology, gender studies, and history in the work of Butler, Giddens, and Goffman. We will then examine contemporary debates about the ways in which self-construction and performance have come to constitute new forms of “immaterial” labour under post-Fordist capital, in, what Jason Read has called, “the micropolitics of capital.” We will also assess the gendered dimensions of these new forms of labour and examine the ways in which this contemporary subsumption of selfhood to capitalist interests has its roots in the history and politics of women’s struggles around work and economic and cultural recognition. We will trace the emergence of new venues for self-commodification, self-branding and self-promotion on television and online, and will explore the concomitant styles, templates and modalities of selfhood propagated by them. Finally, we will examine the dissolution of the self into data in the era of micro-marketing and personalization on the semantic web. Contemporary theories of these transformations come from critical marketing studies, autonomist Marxist criticism, performance studies, feminist criticism and cultural studies and include the work of Sternberg, Virno, Lazzarato, King, Read, Federici, Illouz, and Hochschild.
