Course Description
Reading the text of a Shakespeare play exercises your imagination, stretches your vocabulary, and sets you thinking. As a reader, you can form your own picture of each character, imagine the setting and action, revel in this playwright’s "sublimely indecorous linguistic energy" (Greenblatt), study his dramatic art, and ponder the insights he offers and stimulates—regarding human nature, society then and now, issues like power, politics, gender roles, family dynamics, identity, love, good and evil, revenge and reconciliation, time and mortality, memory— you name it. Reading and discussing the 12 plays on this course, acting out selected scenes, writing about the plays in essays, quizzes, and on the exam will also provide you with lots of opportunity to consider some of the questions you yourselves wrestle with both as students of literature and denizens of the 21St century. Once you have studied the text of a Shakespeare play, you will be able to attend or watch a live or film production of the play with more familiarity, greater understanding, and heightened attentiveness to the interpretive scope the text affords.
Objectives:
When you do your preparatory reading and reflection, participate in class discussions and in (voluntary) periodic scene enactments, and carefully complete assignments, this course provides you, as students, an opportunity to enhance and demonstrate your ability to:

- Read and interpret the 12 selected plays with attentiveness, appreciation, and critical discernment;
- Express, in discussion, your views on the art and 'import' of the plays;
- Articulate a basic understanding of the socio-political context in which Shakespeare created his plays;
- Write well-organized and stylistically correct essays that make judicious use of appropriate secondary sources, show an ability to assess the relative merits of various scholarly arguments, establish and argue a specific thesis, demonstrate an intimate understanding and appreciation of the primary work or works in question, and clarify the theoretical assumptions underlying the arguments and interpretations offered.

Expectations for English 3227E Section 002:
Read assigned selections BEFORE you come to class; come ready with your thoughts, responses, interpretations, and questions. Bring your text to each class. Hand in essays on the Due Dates. Two marks will be deducted for every day late without previous notice or a special request. No faxed or emailed essays can be accepted. Keep a copy of this syllabus handy so you know which play we'll be studying each week.

How the course works:
Each class meeting will be a combination of instructor commentary and class discussion, interspersed, for selected plays, with clips from various film productions. We will devote 4 classes to each play; in the 4th hour we will discuss how a particular scene could be played out, and invite volunteers (who will be enlisted ahead of time) to perform to our "directions." We will pay attention to the performance choices required by the text and to the way performance both shapes and is shaped by interpretation. We will have six in-class quizzes: you will get the question in advance, write your response for 20 minutes in class, and engage in discussion of the question for the rest of the class.
